Supporting Social Emotional Learning and Creating a Trauma Sensitive Classroom

We are excited to welcome Social Emotional Learning experts . . .

Jessica Davies and Amanda Deeter, Montgomery County ESC SEL Department

In a world where the demands on teachers are ever increasing, students are entering classrooms with social and emotional issues. The expectation is that students will be able to leave their issues at the door and engage in learning, however this does not always happen. Social Emotional Learning has become a focus in schools, and many states are creating SEL standards. Participants will leave with practical strategies they can incorporate into their classrooms right away by helping them to understand how stress & trauma impact learning, and how teachers can create classroom environments that decrease behavior problems, better support social emotional learning and build resilient students.
